Excerpt from Junior English Grammar Every teacher of grammar is sentence-hungry, and his need increases with his experience, so that he is driven to foraging in arithmetics and histories and Bibles. Occasionally we dream of a gorgeous feast of 300 - perhaps of even 400 - assorted sentences; we speculate on how much it would cost to have these privately printed. But the cost is too much, or the idea seems extreme - it's too good to be true. So we patiently starve. Probably each of us supposes that his hunger is unnatural - for surely publishers must know what quantity of food will sustain life - and is unwilling to make public avowal of an abnormal craving. At any rate we never satisfy our desire. For my own part I was during twenty years as resigned as any hopeless coolie to a meager diet. Then one day in summer, as I brooded upon the coming pangs of autumn, I made the desperate resolution to gorge myself. I gathered a hundred sentences to exhibit verbs, fifty that were packed with the right kinds of nouns, fifty that contained subjects after the verbs; by hundreds and fifties I gathered them in. It was a banquet to me. For perhaps the first time in history a teacher of grammar was having all he wanted to eat.
